Decision in the case of collision between the steamers Cotton Valley and Charles Morgan.

We have carefully studied the testimony given in the case, and find the Cotton Valley ascending and the Charles Morgan descending the river, on the morning of the first instant, at about four o'clock, it being very dark, the wind blowing hard and raining heavy, at a place about two miles below bonaldson-yide, near Bringler's Point, where a colli-lon occurred whereby the Cotton Valley was sunk and three lives lost. We find the Charles Morgan in her proper place in the river for a descending steamer, fully officered as the law requires, both pilots in the pilothouse at the time, as also the captain, where he had gone to keep out of the hardrain then falling, the first mate on watch and at his post, the steamer backing before and at the time of the collision, and everything done by her officers to avoid a collision, and, afterward, to rescue the people of the ill-fated steamer. We find that the Catton Valley was not not neight of the collision; that it first mate had of the enight of the collision; that it first mate had of the enight of the collision; that it first mate had of the only the first mane had of the collision, both of which we deem grown neglect of United States Local Inspectors.
